MOJITO

The Mojito is said to be derived from the 'Draque', a 17th century concoction of mint, limes, sugar and raw, unaged cane spirit stirred together and served with a wooden spoon. It was drunk at sea for its health benefits by privateers and pirates and was named after Richard Drake, who was said to have invented it.

The Draque was widely adopted by Cubans as a health drink, as it was believed to protect against cholera.

The name 'Mojito' is believed to be derived from the West African word 'mojo', meaning spell or potion. So a Mojito is a "little potion" reflecting the influence of the old health drink and the power of the witchdoctor.
